ABSTRACT

The abstract clearly outlines the study's purpose and highlights the issue of limited community participation in rural planning. However, it could be improved by summarizing more specific findings or quoting key data from interviews or observations.

INTRODUCTION

The introduction provides a strong legal and historical background on rural development in Indonesia. While it covers the importance of planning and participation, the research problem could be more sharply stated for better focus.

RESEARCH METHOD

The qualitative descriptive approach is appropriate and well explained. The combination of observations, document analysis, and interviews provides a solid basis for the research.

However, adding more information about how participants were selected would enhance methodological clarity.

RESULTS AND DISCUSSION

The section is comprehensive and informative. It explains the real-world issues in rural planning processes, including community exclusion and weak coordination. However, the discussion would benefit from a clearer structure and the inclusion of direct quotes from village stakeholders to enrich the narrative.

CONCLUSION

The conclusion effectively summarizes the core findings and highlights the implementation gap between policy and practice. It would be stronger with recommendations for how the planning process could be improved in the future.

REFERENCES

The reference list includes relevant and credible sources on rural planning and development. However, the use of international literature or comparative studies could broaden the article's perspective.
